To combine the initial setup of the eating habit, make the buttons selectable (e.g. if you are a vegetarian that wants to eat gluten-free). Otherwise, if you don't want to combine the initial eating habits then you can leave out the save-button on the button and instantly turn that habit on.

To automate things a bit more following suggestion:
1) After you have finished doing a recipe, you click on finished and then the ingredients is automatically subtracted from your pantry.
2) To make step 1 work you have to implement the pantry so that you can store multiples of a specific ingredient
3) The user is able to input more than one kind of ingredient into their pantry (amount and/or weight of ingredient) -> this can also be automated if the user places QR/barcodes onto his shelves and just scans them (easier than image processing)

10. We would like to know...

Some further questions, but no worries - you are almost done :)

10.1 What did you like most about the app? *

It's potential. Especially when I am able to use it on my desktop PC.

Possible potential:
- a list of intake of the following macro nutritions would be awesome in the form of a pie chart: carbohydrates, fat and proteins micro nutritions like vitamins is not that mandatory.
- body builders probably want to know how much protein intake they have.
- diabetics want to know their bread units.
-> you are able to choose how much you actually ate from your dish (in unit of plates or kg if they have a scale)

10.2 What did you not like about the app? *

To enter all of the ingredients that are one of the mostly used ones (e.g. dried spices, tomatoe paste, ...). To enter all of my ingredients that are most of the time used (e.g. vegetables, fruits, milk, eggs, yogurth, herbs because they rot pretty fast ...)

10.3 Would you download the app? *

- ⦿ yes
- ◯ no
- ◯ I'm not sure

10.4 Are you already using cooking apps? *

- ◯ yes
- ⦿ no
- ◯ Other:

10.5 If so, which apps are you using?

see above

10.6 Do you prefer watching a recipe video instead of reading a recipe? *

○ Prefer watching a video

○ Prefer just reading the recipe steps

◉ Other:
depends on the quality. video is prone to be mistaken when the ingredient is not obvious. text is prone to being unclear sometimes when understood incorrectly.
